The Unknowing Knowable © 2005 S. Kashyap

A young boy, curious enough to find out answers for his doubts, mused over certain profound subjects explained to him by his teachers. He wanted to place the questions he had into the light of advancing knowledge. One day, he was sitting on the river bank idly throwing pebbles in the water. Some dry leaves fell from the trees and floated in the water in one direction. And he found his own direction. The questions he asked to himself were:

“When did the great silence end and sound begin?”

“When did sound give birth to words?”

“When did words become meaningful?”

“When did thoughts get involved in words?”

“When did words become the means of communication?”

“Is it possible to answer the above questions without knowing the knowable?”

He exclaimed “I don’t know what I know! I am eager to know what I do not know. Is unknowing a process of knowing?”

A vision: a dream; a divination; Yes, we can all understand the words but we do not know where they come from. They are of no use if they do not come from the silent holy ground of the Source. And where do we find the Source? The Source is surrounded by eternal mysteries. The mastermind involved in all the mysteries cannot be comprehended by our confused minds in this world of hostility and division. The boy on the river bank, who was thinking of all these profound subjects, came to an understanding that the mystery lies inside every created being as the unknowing knowable.

When the known emphasizes itself in creation as a salient factor of solution, simplified in the light of progression and advancement, it sparkles and mirrors itself in the silent ground of the heart, which is also the Source of the unknown. The unknown is known when there is no impediment of doubt and skepticism. God made this world and we are making God continuously in a mysterious fashion. We enjoy our handiwork. The boy who was thus musing saw bubbles moving along the bank of the river and said to himself, “when the bubbles break they all become water.”

When our bubble of doubt and insincere approaches break on the bank of time, all becomes time. Or in other words, we all become space free entities coursing towards the magnificent eternal. The boy was hailed as a mystic later on in life.
